THE NINETEENTH CENTURY, or

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY, or THE NEW DISPENSATION; being an Examination of the Claims and Assertions of Emanuel Swedenborg, (with a brief review of the writings of Andrew Jackson Davis.) By a Layman. New York, 1852, 12mo., pp. 425.

We cordially bear witness to the general ability and well-timedness of the work. * * It is, in its general scope, ammently popular. It directs its appeal to the plain sound sense of the masses.

It is ably written, often eloquent, and in a far more lucid style than is usually employed by writers of the Swedenborgian school. Many of its criticisms on the spirit of the age are puspeat and at onally sustained; a vein of macculate thought pervades its course of argument, and no one can read it in a contemplative mood without re-siving important and frautful suggestions.

It compresses a great amount of information and speculation on such spiritual subjects as are now generally discussed in nearly all intelligent circles. For those who are not well read in reference to the novelbes of the spiritual revolutions of the day, it will prove a valuable magual, it not a counsellor and guide. [Sunday Coarier. It is a beautiful specimen of typography, very creditable to the American press, and forms a handsome solution. * I fact, this is a work both suited for and works.

VENETIA TRELAWNEY—Vol. 2, and conclusion, by G. W. M. Reynolds.

The best specimen of a connected series of remarkable historical novels, to which we referred in a late number. They have accided series and scenes are recognized. In all essential particulars, these laves are present real life and actual occurrences; and the characters and scenes are recognized. In all essential particulars, these areve's represent real life and actual occurrences; and the fact that they emiliace a period so near the present, accounts, as part, for the attraction they possess. It is undestable that the pictures of sife are often distracting, but, in a philosophic point of view, they are valuable, and in a historical one, suggest important results. The genius of the author investe even revolving subjects with a charm; and we are not surprised at the great demand for these works; and hope the categoristic publishers will resp an ample reward for their great outlay.
